

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Alabama

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Alabama

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Alabama:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $20.61 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,072 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 114 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 77,000 people in Alabama – including 44,000 children and 43,400 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Alaska

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Alaska

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Alaska:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $29.73 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,546 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $13.00 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 91 hours per week – over 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 4,000 people in Alaska – including 2,100 children and 2,800 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Arizona

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Arizona

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Arizona:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $34.18 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,778 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $14.70 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 93 hours per week – over 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 31,500 people in Arizona – including 17,400 children and 18,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Arkansas

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Arkansas

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Arkansas:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $18.98 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $987 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $11 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 69 hours per week – nearly 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 24,800 people in Arkansas – including 13,900 children and 13,100 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in California

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in California

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in California:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $49.61 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,580 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $16.50 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 120 hours per week – 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 306,800 people in California – including 137,800 children and 192,200 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Colorado

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Colorado

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Colorado:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $36.79 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,913 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $14.81 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 99 hours per week – 2.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 40,600 people in Colorado – including 21,600 children and 24,000 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Connecticut

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Connecticut

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Connecticut:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $35.42 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,842 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $16.35 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 87 hours per week – over 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 57,100 people in Connecticut – including 25,900 children and 37,300 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in the District of Columbia

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in the District of Columbia

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in the District of Columbia:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $44.50 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,314 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $17.50 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 102 hours per week – 2.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 16,000 people in D.C. – including 6,700 children and 7,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Delaware

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Delaware

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Delaware:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $32.18 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,674 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 86 hours per week – 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 9,900 people in Delaware – including 5,500 children and 6,300 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Florida

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Florida

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Florida:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $37.27 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,938 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $13 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 115 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 149,700 people in Florida – including 80,200 children and 92,800 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Georgia

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Georgia

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Georgia:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $29.46 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,532 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 163 hours per week – 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 116,500 people in Georgia – including 64,500 children and 68,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Hawaii

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Hawaii

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Hawaii:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $49.19 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,558 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $14 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 141 hours per week – 3.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 19,800 people in Hawaii – including 10,300 children and 15,400 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Idaho

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Idaho

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Idaho:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $27.83 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,447 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 154 hours per week – nearly 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 5,400 people in Idaho – including 3,100 children and 3,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Illinois

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Illinois

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Illinois:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $29.81 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,550 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 79 hours per week – 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 153,400 people in Illinois – including 73,400 children and 84,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Indiana

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Indiana

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Indiana:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $22.18 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,153 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 122 hours per week – 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 50,000 people in Indiana – including 28,000 children and 25,200 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Iowa

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Iowa

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Iowa:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $19.99 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,040 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 110 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 16,500 people in Iowa – including 9,500 children and 10,000 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Kansas

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Kansas

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Kansas:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $20.87 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,085 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 115 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 13,400 people in Kansas – including 7,400 children and 7,200 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Kentucky

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Kentucky

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Kentucky:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $21.47 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,116 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 118 hours per week – over 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 53,700 people in Kentucky – including 27,000 children and 26,100 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Louisiana

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Louisiana

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Louisiana:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $22.88 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,190 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 126 hours per week – over 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 71,700 people in Louisiana – including 39,200 children and 40,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Maine

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Maine

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Maine:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $28.42 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,478 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $14.65 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 78 hours per week – nearly 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 10,500 people in Maine – including 5,500 children and 6,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Maryland

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Maryland

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Maryland:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $39.15 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,036 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 104 hours per week – more than 2.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 69,500 people in Maryland – including 34,000 children and 42,300 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Massachusetts

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Massachusetts

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Massachusetts:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $45.90 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,387 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 122 hours per week – 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 115,000 people in Massachusetts – including 51,100 children and 79,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Michigan

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Michigan

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Michigan:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $24.46 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,272 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $12.48 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 78 hours per week – 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 83,200 people in Michigan – including 46,400 children and 42,700 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Minnesota

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Minnesota

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Minnesota:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $28.23 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,468 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $11.13 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 101 hours per week – 2.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 58,900 people in Minnesota – including 32,600 children and 41,300 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Mississippi

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Mississippi

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Mississippi:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $20.79 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,081 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 115 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 51,800 people in Mississippi – including 28,900 children and 27,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Missouri

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Missouri

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Missouri:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $21.61 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,124 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $13.75 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 62 hours per week – 1.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 54,700 people in Missouri – including 30,700 children and 28,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Montana

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Montana

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Montana:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $28.99 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,508 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $10.55 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 110 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 5,600 people in Montana – including 2,900 children and 3,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Nebraska

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Nebraska

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Nebraska:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $21.57 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,122 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $13.50 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 64 hours per week – 1.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 14,200 people in Nebraska – including 8,000 children and 9,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Nevada

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Nevada

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Nevada:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $32.94 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,713 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $12 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 110 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 18,700 people in Nevada – including 10,100 children and 10,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in New Hampshire

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in New Hampshire

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in New Hampshire:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $35.08 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,824 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 194 hours per week – nearly 5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 7,400 people in New Hampshire – including 3,800 children and 5,100 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in New Jersey

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in New Jersey

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in New Jersey:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $39.99 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,079 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15.49 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 103 hours per week – 2.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 109,500 people in New Jersey – including 51,500 children and 75,100 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in New Mexico

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in New Mexico

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in New Mexico:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $23.18 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,025 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $12 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 77 hours per week – nearly 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 13,100 people in New Mexico – including 7,100 children and 8,000 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in New York

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in New York

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in New York:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $46.03 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,394 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15.50 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 119 hours per week – 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 343,600 people in New York – including 148,100 children and 246,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in North Carolina

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in North Carolina

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in North Carolina:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $27.14 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,411 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 150 hours per week – nearly 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 93,100 people in North Carolina – including 51,700 children and 51,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in North Dakota

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in North Dakota

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in North Dakota:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $19.47 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,013 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 107 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 4,600 people in North Dakota – including 2,600 children and 2,800 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Ohio

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Ohio

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Ohio:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $22.51 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,171 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $10.70 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 84 hours per week – 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 152,100 people in Ohio – including 84,500 children and 70,800 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Oklahoma

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Oklahoma

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Oklahoma:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $20.98 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,091 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 116 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 32,300 people in Oklahoma – including 18,400 children and 15,400 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Oregon

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Oregon

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Oregon:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $33.02 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,717 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15.05 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 88 hours per week – more than 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 28,500 people in Oregon – including 14,400 children and 15,800 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Pennsylvania

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Pennsylvania

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Pennsylvania:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $27.83 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,447 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 154 hours per week – nearly 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 120,200 people in Pennsylvania – including 61,700 children and 68,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Rhode Island

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Rhode Island

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Rhode Island:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $31.71 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,649 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $15 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 85 hours per week – 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 16,100 people in Rhode Island – including 7,700 children and 10,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in South Carolina

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in South Carolina

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in South Carolina:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $25.91 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,347 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 143 hours per week – more than 3.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 56,000 people in South Carolina – including 32,200 children and 29,900 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in South Dakota

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in South Dakota

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in South Dakota:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $18.96 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $986 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $11.50 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 66 hours per week – more than 1.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 5,400 people in South Dakota – including 3,100 children and 3,100 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Tennessee

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Tennessee

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Tennessee:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $27.01 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,404 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 149 hours per week – nearly 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 76,100 people in Tennessee – including 43,200 children and 36,600 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Texas

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Texas

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Texas:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $29.64 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,542 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 164 hours per week – 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 239,800 people in Texas – including 134,600 children and 147,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Utah

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Utah

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Utah:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $29.29 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,523 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 162 hours per week – 4 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 9,600 people in Utah – including 5,400 children and 6,200 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Vermont

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Vermont

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Vermont:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $29.73 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,546 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $14.01 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 85 hours per week – 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 5,800 people in Vermont – including 3,100 children and 3,400 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Virginia

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Virginia

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Virginia:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $33.64 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,749 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $12.41 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 108 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 79,300 people in Virginia – including 41,700 children and 48,000 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Washington

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Washington

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Washington:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $41.11 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $2,138 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $16.66 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 99 hours per week – 2.5 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 56,300 people in Washington – including 28,300 children and 35,500 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in West Virginia

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in West Virginia

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in West Virginia:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $18.94 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $985 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $8.75 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 87 hours per week – more than 2 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 16,400 people in West Virginia – including 8,100 children and 8,700 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Wisconsin

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Wisconsin

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Wisconsin:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $23.15 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,204 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 128 hours per week – more than 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 31,700 people in Wisconsin – including 17,500 children and 19,000 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.

Work Requirements and Time Limits in Rental Assistance Will Worsen Housing Instability in Wyoming

Everyone deserves to live in a safe, stable, affordable home. Federal rental assistance programs help more than 10 million people – overwhelmingly families with children, older adults, people with disabilities, full-time caregivers, and workers paid low wages – keep a roof over their heads. Rental assistance is a vital tool to combat the affordable housing crisis, helping families afford the cost of rent and freeing up more income for other necessities, like nutritious food, medical care, transportation, and school supplies. However, because of chronic underfunding, only one in four households that qualify receive any form of rental assistance.

Instead of fighting for increased investments in federal rental assistance programs, the Trump administration released a rule that would put over 3 million people nationwide, more than half of them children, at risk of eviction and homelessness by allowing Public Housing Authorities (PHAs) and HUD-assisted housing providers to impose work requirements and/or time limits on assisted families. Under the rule, families will lose their assistance if they exceed strict time limits, cannot meet harsh work requirements, or struggle to meet burdensome new paperwork requirements.

Impact of Work Requirements and Time Limits on Families and Children in Wyoming

Most people in HUD-assisted housing who can work do work. Eighty-one percent of non-disabled people without young children worked in the past year, and those who do not work attend school, are caregivers, or are ill.

Many working people still need rental assistance to help them afford housing because wages have not kept up with housing costs. For example, in Wyoming:

- A full-time worker must earn an hourly Housing Wage of $20.25 to afford the average Fair Market Rent (FMR) of $1,053 for a two-bedroom rental home.
- Minimum wage in the state is $7.25 per hour.
- A minimum-wage worker must work 112 hours per week – nearly 3 full-time jobs – to afford a modest two-bedroom rental home at Fair Market Rent.
- The Trump Administration’s two-year time limit proposal would put 1,800 people in Wyoming – including 1,000 children and 1,000 people in working families – at risk of losing their assistance and facing eviction, and in worst cases, homelessness.

Given the severe shortage of affordable homes for the lowest-income renters and the gap between low incomes and the high cost of housing, harmful policies like time limits and work requirements only serve to kick people off assistance – not increase employment opportunities or wages.

Instead of pursuing policies that will increase housing insecurity for millions of people, policymakers should enact proven solutions to help struggling households earn more and get ahead, including expanding the availability of rental assistance to help people afford safe, stable housing.

Learn more about the work requirements and time limits proposed rule here.