

October 23, 2017

The Honorable Ben Carson
Secretary, Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD)
451 7th Street SW, Washington, DC 20410

To Secretary Carson,

We, the undersigned 511 organizations and local governments, write as part of a Hurricane Housing Recovery Coalition to express our deep concerns about a letter sent by members of the Texas Congressional delegation to your office on September 21, 2017. The letter included recommendations that, if approved by HUD, would have serious, long-term, and negative consequences for the low income people and communities that were devastated by Hurricanes Harvey, Irma, and Maria.

We continue to share, appreciate, and support the urgent need to expedite disaster recovery resources to impacted communities. However, we strongly oppose policy changes that would allow scarce resources to be diverted away from the lowest income people with the greatest recovery needs—needs that are exacerbated by the severe shortage of safe, decent, and affordable homes—and reduce one of the only available opportunities for survivors to weigh in on a recovery process that directly impacts their families and communities.

The Hurricane Housing Recovery Coalition is committed to ensuring that federal housing recovery and rebuilding efforts are complete and equitable for all individuals and communities impacted by the recent disasters. We represent national, state, and local organizations, including many working directly with impacted communities in Texas, Florida, Louisiana, Georgia, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands and with first-hand experience recovering after prior disasters.

We welcome the opportunity to work with you to find alternative approaches that ensure the recovery process is fair and equitable for all survivors, including low income seniors, people with disabilities, families with children, veterans, among others who are often the hardest-hit by disasters and have the fewest resources to recover afterwards.

Lowering the Requirement To Serve Low and Moderate Income Households Will Allow Scarce Resources To Be Diverted Away From Survivors with the Greatest Needs.

The Community Development Block Grant Disaster Recovery (CDBG-DR) program is one of the primary tools used by the federal government to help the lowest income families and communities recover after a disaster. But far too often, these scarce resources are siphoned away from the lower income people and communities that face the greatest recovery needs – and for whom the program was designed. Instead, these dollars are frequently diverted to help households with higher incomes, despite the fact these higher income households also have access to other resources – including Small Business Administration (SBA) loans, insurance coverage, and savings – that lower income people do not have available to them. As a result, vulnerable populations – including low income seniors, people with disabilities, families with children, veterans, and others – are unable to get the disaster aid they need to recover.

We strongly disagree with the recommendation included in the letter sent by members of the Texas delegation to reduce the current requirement that 70% of CDBG-DR funds benefit low and moderate income people to just 50%. In the absence of any countervailing data to suggest that such a drastic measure is needed, this policy change would weaken the federal government's commitment to ensuring that the recovery needs of low income people and communities are not overlooked and would undermine protections put in place to ensure that federal resources are spent in the most effective and targeted way to address the greatest needs.

Instead, we urge HUD to maintain the current requirement that 70% of CDBG-DR investments serve people with low and moderate incomes unless and until there is conclusive data that demonstrates the need for this change.

Allowing States To Underinvest In The Housing Recovery Will Exacerbate The Already Severe Shortage of Safe, Decent, and Affordable Homes.

After a disaster, it is critical that states use federal recovery resources in a fair and equitable way to address the housing, infrastructure, and mitigation needs in impacted communities. Decisions about how to allocate resources should be based on HUD's "unmet needs" assessment, which represents the best available data on the needs of the state and which Congress uses to determine its appropriation of CDBG-DR resources.

Too often states and local communities have chosen to divert scarce federal dollars that were slated for housing recovery into infrastructure projects, while families were denied housing assistance because of a "lack" of housing funds. While we wholeheartedly support infrastructure projects that will restore actual damaged infrastructure and prevent future flooding, Congress should not permit state and local governments to allocate a disproportionate share of the limited federal funds into public infrastructure projects at the expense of focusing on the housing needs of people with the lowest incomes, who are most vulnerable to disasters and have the fewest resources to recover.

Reasonable restrictions are necessary to ensure that federal resources are used to address the full scope of needs after a disaster. Without this requirement, the severe shortage of affordable rental homes in these communities will only get worse, leading to more family instability and in worst cases, homelessness.

Before the recent storms, Texas and Florida had some of the worst housing shortages in the nation. According to research from the National Low Income Housing Coalition, there were only 27 affordable and available homes for every 100 extremely low income households in Florida, and there were only 29 affordable and available rental homes for every 100 extremely low income households in Texas. This shortage is due to the fact that the private market typically cannot build or preserve affordable rental homes for extremely low income households without federal investments. The rent these households can afford to pay rarely covers the cost to build and adequately maintain the necessary housing – let alone repair or rebuild after a disaster. Because the private sector is unable to address the housing needs of extremely low income renters after a disaster, Congress must ensure that states invest federal disaster recovery resources to repair and replace damaged and destroyed affordable rental homes.

Without A Reasonable Opportunity For Public Input, Survivors Will Have No Say On A Recovery Process That Directly Impacts Their Families and Communities.

The letter sent by members of the Texas delegation to HUD recommends reducing the public comment period on the state’s Action Plan from 30 days to 7 days. While we share and appreciate the urgent need to provide disaster recovery resources, disaster survivors deserve the opportunity to weigh in on a recovery process that will directly impact them.

Because this is the only opportunity for survivors to learn what the state proposes to do with the available funds, who will be eligible, who will manage the programs, and what the time frame will be for assistance, it is critical that the full 30 day comment period be maintained. Seven days is not enough time for most people to meaningfully obtain information, analyze and participate in planning for the billions of dollars that will have an impact on many communities.

A full public comment period provides the state with an opportunity to improve its program design. After past disasters, important feedback was provided through public comments that helped state officials ensure that resources were targeted more effectively and fairly. Moreover, maintaining the 30-day comment period will not meaningfully delay disaster resources from getting to people and communities in need.

Conclusion

The road to full recovery will be long and difficult. We must make sure that any effort to expedite the recovery process does not come at the expense of the low income people and communities that were devastated by Hurricanes Harvey, Irma, and Maria. We welcome the opportunity to work with you to find alternative approaches that ensure the recovery process is fair and equitable for all survivors.
